Migrant Adult Language Learning in a Transnational Context

John Ippolito, York University

Katherine Rehner, University of Toronto Mississauga

Abstract:
This presentation reports on the preliminary stages of a multi-year adult literacy project. The project is motivated by the intensity of contemporary global migration, where unprecedented numbers of adult migrants are forced into linguistically alien terrains and are often isolated and disadvantaged by language barriers preventing full participation in host societies. The project responds to this challenge with a comparative analysis of the formal and informal language learning experiences of adult migrants in three transit or destination countries characterized by an influx of newcomers: York Region, Ontario, Canada; Erie County, Pennsylvania, United States; and Agrigento, Sicily, Italy. Using a hybrid theoretical framework linking transnationalism (Glick Schiller, Basch & Szanton Blanc, 1995) and translanguageing (Otheguy, García & Reid, 2015), the project undertakes a fluid and multidirectional study of migration and conducts an analysis directed at the first-person experiences of language use in linguistically diverse contexts. Drawing on surveys and interviews, the project assesses migrants’ priorities for language learning, their agency in choosing language-learning opportunities and how language learning serves their needs. Supplementary perspectives from adult education providers and
Migrant Adult Language Learning

academics in migration-related fields inform evidence-based pedagogical and policy recommendations for how language-learning opportunities can support the social integration of adult migrants.

Keywords: migration; transnationalism; translingualism

References

Biographical Notes

John Ippolito is an associate professor in the Faculty of Education at York University. His research centers on relationships between families and schools in contexts of linguistic and cultural hyper-diversity. His applied studies involve adult education as outreach to caregivers and educators and are increasingly focused on migrants and refugees.

Katherine Rehner is an associate professor in the Department of Language Studies at the University of Toronto Mississauga, with a graduate appointment in the Department of Curriculum, Teaching and Learning at OISE. Her research centers on second language teaching and learning, particularly as concerns the social aspects of language use.